The Executive Business Review Framework

What were we trying to achieve?

Opens the review by re-grounding everyone in the original goal -- easy to assume everyone remembers, and often untrue, especially on the customer's side where priorities shift quickly.

What results have we achieved?

The evidence section -- specific, numeric wherever possible, and honest about partial progress rather than only showing the wins.

What challenges remain?

Naming this deliberately, rather than letting the customer bring it up first, is what makes an EBR feel like a genuine partnership conversation instead of a vendor highlight reel.

What opportunities exist?

The natural, evidence-backed place for an expansion conversation to surface -- because it follows directly from demonstrated results, not from a sales calendar.

What should we do next?

Closes the review with specific, owned next steps -- an EBR without this ending is a nice conversation that produces no forward motion.
