The Expansion Opportunity Matrix

Product Usage

Is adoption deep and consistent, or is the customer still finding their footing with what they've already bought? Raising expansion with an account that hasn't yet mastered its current tier reads as tone-deaf, however well-intentioned the offer is.

Customer Outcomes

Has the customer achieved measurable success with what they have today? Usage without a demonstrated outcome is not a strong enough foundation for a bigger ask -- it's evidence of activity, not proof of value.

Executive Trust

Do decision-makers see you as a trusted advisor, or as a vendor they tolerate? Expansion recommendations land very differently depending on which one is true, regardless of how good the underlying business case is.

Business Need

Has the customer's business evolved in ways that create a new, genuine reason for more -- growth, a new use case, a new team needing access? An expansion pitch built on the vendor's need for more revenue rather than the customer's actual situation rarely survives contact with a real budget conversation.
